Selected Poems

Jai Arun Ravine

dthaa yai: a naming ceremony for my wide eyed ancestors

I ask for their names and the bamboo in my mother’s fingers weakens do you call to them, and she strings vowels in her throat.
without orange blossoms and faded magenta silk, without prying one face from this other facing it
  long enough to forget.
shoulders pressed in paper and ink sounds I cannot see heat escapes my grandfather’s skin my grandmother’s flared nostrils a lucid dragon sigh merit pulls his chest upward strictness of flag and brass pole become the fusion in his lips her ovals haunt the sharpness in his cheek chrysanthemum sucked from a sieve dthaa                                           yai yai

My mother has borrowed his eyes Her flesh lies wide down soi sib-song I step on grandmother’s dress silk and wood scour my wet heels thread and splinter she was already undone when her youngest daughter Ravine – Selected Poems

parted her thighs for my birth  wun atid  red sun day inscribed vowels on my chest

I did not find until later I am always looking for them in the bend of my fingers in my failed pronunciations: jung wat  amphur  mueang moo ban  to grasp a tendril, astral, ancestral hum. conjuring their bodies from ink and sound  I see stunted cells that do not know their blood has found me  eager to plant stems I watch for a deepening in my skin  remedy for pocked face fluency in tongue  and memory of Syam before it was ever named—memory of when they  named me dek pom daeng¹

I am red
a red child
a red boy who eats fire half eaten
half child with a half life the mark of white and red rented a wife rented half split the rent in half child eating red red headed boy eating fire half boy half genitals that hang when on all fours
step daughter
half sister half brother one and a half rented wife with a head of fire

¹ “Red-haired child,” referring to the offspring of Thai women and white men conceived during sex tourism or military leave. Luk kreung, or “half child,” also refers to someone who is half Thai and half white.
Excerpt from perm pew see kow sukapub dee: for healthy white skin

kae piang

mer kong di chun lap fun my mother dreams of pulling me by the hair. I shave my head and in her dream she is strangled by muddy locks that grow wild like fire.
I wish to be that beautiful. suay suay jung but then again, mai chai. mai dai na kha I cannot change this blood.

luk kreung. one half, one half of a whole.

screaming is harder when it is halved, when my white father screams at my brown mother, when my brown mother screams at her white lies, muea my face screams at my hands.

chun kit wa—kit gon—
your blood was eating at my bone.
kohn dieow

no one pays me any attention because I am not the beautiful Asian girl, I cannot make my tongue sound as though it was harvested here. I try by not speaking, by waiing, by being as quiet as possible—and then the only noise is that of the farang around the table waiting for food. the English language is like assault rifles here, where Thai teenagers read the newspaper & talk on their cell phones & laugh & share dtom yom ngung and pay in correct change without a sound.

I try to be polite & this means I do not open my mouth.

only for ro tee, pad thai, guway dteow by the side of the street pet pet freeing my eyes from their sockets. I want to become smaller, browner, less noticeable, just like the other Thai girls on mopeds, small torsos & thin hips, in black skirts & white uniform shirts, clips in their hair, black black black long & straight & flying, which is what I catch when I think about falling into them.
