Where Formats and Budget Lines Collide: Librarians Speak Out! by Frances C. Wilkinson and Linda K. Lewis — in this continuing series in September's ATG, Fran and Linda are concerned about the continued viability of multiple formats. How is the Web affecting reference collection development decisions? How much duplication of formats can libraries really afford? What proportion of the reference budget is spent on different formats if it is separated at all? Who has the responsibility for selecting reference materials? Are librarians still concerned about the archiving of electronic indexes? What place will there be for different formats in reference collections? These are just some of the questions that Fran and Linda asked a group of reference and collection development librarians.

The Shifting Sands of Cyberpublishing: .................. 23

Markets, Pricing and other Dilemmas by Tom Gilson — Libraries have a bigger responsibility than just the maintenance of information. We have tried in our imperfect way to act as the record keepers for the written word. As uncertain as the future looks, it will be one of our greatest challenges to maintain that commitment.

A Balmy Time for CD-ROM ...................... 26

by Cheryl LaGuardia — Librarians and publishers alike are struggling through this age rampant with fears and "uncertainties" about the right format to use. As we work increasingly with the World Wide Web, is CD-ROMs applicability waning? Cheryl LaGuardia thinks not.

Handling Medusa—Merger and Acquisitions ........................................ 58
The Impact of Publisher Mergers on Journal Prices: An Update by Mark J. McCabe
— In the first of a spell-binding two part series, Medusa casts her malevolent gaze on mergers, acquisitions and anti-trust law. A reputable professor of business administration informs her that, traditionally, economists have not paid a great deal of attention to the publishing industry. This may change as practitioners and scholars like Prof. Mark McCabe begin to address the peculiar characteristics of this rapidly-changing business.
