2006

People Profile: Tim Coates

Editor

Follow this and additional works at: http://docs.lib.purdue.edu/atg

Part of the Library and Information Science Commons

Recommended Citation
Editor (2006) "People Profile: Tim Coates," Against the Grain: Vol. 18: Iss. 6, Article 23.
DOI: http://dx.doi.org/10.7771/2380-176X.4700

This document has been made available through Purdue e-Pubs, a service of the Purdue University Libraries. Please contact epubs@purdue.edu for additional information.
The Good Library Campaign...
from page 38

portion spent on books has fallen from 12 percent to 6 percent. Books are no longer regarded as the lifeblood of the library service. We are told over and over again that “libraries are about a great deal more than books.”

Indeed, a report by consultants PricewaterhouseCoopers advising the British government in its quest to “improve the lives of local communities” describes a “public library service” that is “focused on the optimum way of commissioning lifelong learning outcomes for local communities, rather than on traditional ‘bricks and mortar’ library services” and says that such a service “creates opportunities for radical new thinking on delivery vehicles within this sector ... [that encourage] a range of alternative providers, expertise, and new ways of working ... maximising resources on frontline delivery, and making the services much more responsive to existing users, and bringing in new users.”

So public libraries in the United Kingdom find themselves caught between two extreme alternatives. On the one hand there is the view expressed by the PricewaterhouseCoopers report, which says book stocks don’t matter because libraries are about seeking “learning outcomes,” and on the other there are those who say the decline in book stocks signals the end of civilization. And meanwhile, the book stocks keep on declining, so that when you go into a library nowadays, it may be that all you will find are some old dog-eared copies of titles you wouldn’t ever want to read.

The problem is that because in the United Kingdom libraries are funded by the government, and those funds are awarded without any reference to any measure of performance, it is possible to define what library policy should be without having to take into account the public response to what is done. If people don’t borrow books, no one necessarily investigates why, and so those holding the purse strings are just as likely to decide that society has changed and people no longer wish to use libraries as to recognize the real cause — that there were no books they wanted to borrow.

The Good Library Campaign
I have attempted, through the Good Library Blog (www.goodlibraryguide.com/blog), to call attention to the terrible position public libraries (university libraries are another story; my efforts, I must stress, are focused on public libraries) have found themselves in and to provide a forum for people to discuss what is happening. Independent publishers and well-known authors such as Susan Hill and John Cunliffe are using the blog to bring pressure to bear on those in power. Susan Hill, in fact, has taken the issue to the national papers. An article that appeared in the Guardian on 11 September 2006 described her as “accus[ing] senior managers of public libraries of abandoning their commitment to books and manoeuvring to turn library buildings into social centres” and quotes her as saying, “They have been actively trying for years to get rid of books and introduce almost anything else.”

But no one had the right to decide, arbitrarily, that books are a thing of the past. No one has asked the public how they feel about the matter, and whenever the British Parliament has expressed a view, it has certainly not been to this effect. No one would ever expect them to ask for books to be removed from libraries.

Rumors
from page 16

should be encouraged. As both producers of copyrighted works and users of orphan works, publishers are experienced both in administering and granting permissions as rights-holders and in trying to obtain permission from other rights-holders. The United States Copyright Office has recently recognized the problems of ‘orphan works’ that authors, libraries, and other institutions are seeking permission to re-use and similar issues are being raised in the European Union. As we all know, the astute Michael Mabe is CEO of STM.

www.stm-assc.org/documents-statement-public-co

EBSCO Information Services is recognized in the sixth annual EContent 100, EContent magazine’s list of the companies that matter most in the digital content industry. Providing services for the access and management of electronic journals, packages, and databases, as well as a provider of traditional print subscription services, EBSCO has appeared in the EContent 100 annually since the inaugural list was published in December 2001. “Despite the steady march of consolidation and the rapid