Electronic Resource Management Systems — Guest Editor, Heather Klusendorf

Electronic Resource Management Systems: Still Trying to Hit the Moving Target..........................1
by Heather Klusendorf — Electronic resource management systems are not new but librarians still struggle with e-resource management.

We Can Work It Out: What an ERM Needs............................................. 18
by Susan Klimley — The most basic information often required in an ERM is the ability to locate the titles to which that library branch subscribes.

Revisiting Wayne State University’s ERM System: Six Years Later .......... 20
by Nancy Beals — Adopting an ERM system, whether it’s home-owned or purchased, is not as straightforward as many would think.

Electronic Resource Management Systems and the Small to Medium University Library: An Argument for Implementation.................. 22
by Ryan Weir — Electronic resources are always changing and evolving, and the ways in which we strive to provide access are evolving as well.

How Can Publishers Better Support ERMs?........................................... 26
by Heather Staines — Despite industry news sites that are crowded with press releases, promotions, and webinar trainings about ERMs, Heather was surprised to learn that not every library has one.

Implementing the 360 Suite at Indiana State University................................. 30 by George Stachokas — Recognizing that implementation was going to be a daunting task, ISU gave themselves plenty of time to prepare prior to announcing the new system to their patrons.

Re-Inventing the ERM: EBSCO Takes a New Approach to E-Resource Management with the Release of ERM Essentials............................. 32
by Oliver Pesch — It has been nearly six years since EBSCO published their groundbreaking report that includes a detailed data dictionary and functional specifications for ERM systems.

Measure for Measure: Librarians Want a More Effective ERM, Results from ERM Systems Usage Trends Survey...34
by Heather Klusendorf — According to a recent survey of Against the Grain readers, librarians seem pleased with the level of improvement that ERM systems offer to daily e-resource workflow.

Op Ed — Pelikan’s Antidisambiguation............................................. 54

Books: Ownership, Conveyance, Licensure by Michael Pelikan — Digital Rights Management needs to be able to handle all of our uses of eBooks in a manner resembling our uses of printed and bound books.

No Time for Collection Development Policies........................................... 42
by Gary Geer — The articles in this special report section describe some challenges to the relevance of the collection policy.

Collection Assessment: A Dubious Investment........................................ 42
by Cindy Craig — Does your academic library still evaluate subject collections? Do you refer to any policies when you order books? Your answer to these questions may help determine if collection assessments and policy revisions are still worthwhile.

Purchase-on-Demand: An Overview of the Literature.................................. 46
by Marna Hostetler — Although it is not a new idea, Purchase-on-Demand is a trend that has truly come into its own over the last decade.

ATG SPECIAL REPORTS

Developing a Policy for Kindle and iPod Content: One Library’s Experience...47
by Margaret Foote — Kindles and other eBook readers, iPod Touch, and other audio files are beginning to be made available to library users and despite technology, the content for both still requires some sort of policy.

A Fire To Be Kindled............................................. 49 by Matthew Landau — The motto at Renn- ington College is to provide “real skills for the real world,” but Matthew says he feels they do much more than that.

Focus versus Breadth in Special Collections.......................................... 50
by Patrick Scott — Everyone knows that Special Collections are expensive, and different, and those two “facts” have largely determined the conventional wisdom about how to plan (and justify) expenditures for them.

LEGAL ISSUES

Edited by Bryan Carson, Bruce Strauch, and Jack Montgomery

Why Talk About Legal & Ethical Issues?
by Bryan M. Carson and Herbert L. Carson

— Those who use technology need to be aware of legal and ethical issues.

TECHNOLOGY AND STANDARDS

Letting the Patron Drive by Cris Ferguson
— Shrinking budgets and limited financial resources have made it increasingly important for libraries to spend their money wisely.

I Hear the Train A Comin’ by Greg Tananbaum
— Greg recently had the pleasure of speaking with Terry Ehling about arXiv.

BOOKSELLING AND VENDING

March of the Dinosaurs by Scott Smith — This is about shaping the new opportunities to come.

Bet You Missed It by Xan Arch — What if instead of buying an ERMS product, we build just the functions we need? Or borrow the work of others?

Lost in Austin by Tom Leonhardt — Tom just attended Sal Lee’s Conference at the U. of Oklahoma and tells us all about it.

Building Library Collections in the 21st Century by Arlene Sievers-Hill — What do you do, and what happens when your department head isn’t there?

REVIEWS

Monographic Musings by Deb Vaughn — In this issue, read about several new titles from ALA.

From the Reference Desk by Tom Gilson — One of Tom’s reviews includes the Encyclopedia of Group Processes and Intergroup Relations.

Legally Speaking by Laura Gasaway — A community college regularly films the lectures of speakers invited to speak on campus. In order to place a video copy of the talk online, must the institution seek permission?
