ALA Midwinter Issue

Guest Editor, Mark Herrig (Winthrop University)

The Future of the Book:
Does It Have One? ......................... 1

by Mark Herrig — When the Chronicle of Higher Education posted a colloquy on the “death of the book,” Mark Herrig responded as forcibly as he could that the book was not yet dead.

Libraries, Books, and Academic Freedom .... 19

by S. David Mash — Why does confusion over the place of the classic library persist?

On Navigating Labyrinths and Webs:
Print and the Internet as Institutions of Research ... 24

by David D. Oberhelman — Oberhelman’s assertion is about the fundamental differences between the nature of print and the Internet as institutions of research.

A Bookseller Views the Future of the Book ... 28

by James Presgraves — This article shares a captivating bibliodrama, discusses points of probable change in the book trade, and identifies points that probably won’t change.

The Future of Books and Libraries .......... 30

by Sidney E. Berger — Libraries will not be done away with. They will evolve.

The Future of Books and Reading in an Age of Hyperlinks ............. 38

by Edwin S. Glaives — There are three major developments in the history of human communication—the advent of the printed word, the invention of the printing press, and the electronic revolution. Rarely if ever has the new technology completely replaced the old.

Holy Books and eBooks ......................... 42

by Allene Stuart Phy-Olsen — Why do books occupy such an exalted position in many of the religions of the world?

Here Lies The Book, R.I.P.: ................. 44

The Report of Its Death Has Been Greatly Exaggerated by Mark Y. Herrig — Everywhere you turn, libraries have either “deserted” their books, reported that books are “vanishing,” or that the concept of books is “obsolete,” says Mark Herrig. He believes that the book is far from dead.

Op Ed — Opinions and Editorials ....... 50

Monster of Non-circulating Library Collections Rears Ugly Head—Again by Phil Davis — In economically desperate times, the monster of inefficiency attacks collection librarians for purchasing books that are never used. While this argument is popular, it is both unfounded and unproductive.

Biz of Acq — Part I ........... 52

Cooperative Collection Development in Consortium of College Libraries: The CONSORT Experience by Margo Warner-Curt — In late 2000, the directors of the CONSORT Libraries asked their collection development librarians to come up with a written cooperative collection development plan.

Biz of Acq — Part II .......... 54

Collection Assessment of the CONSORT Collections by Margo Warner-Curt — This second article describes the collection assessment performed as a preliminary step in getting a cooperative collection development program off the ground. The information in this article and the lessons learned by Margo will be essential to anyone embarking on a major collection assessment project.

Between the Stacks: ......................... 57

The Emergence of a New Library Community by Allen Williams — The Internet is a powerful and easy way for library science professionals to aggregate and disseminate information. So late one night, while unemployed and needing a creative outlet, Allen decided to create what he could not find—a place on the Internet where members of this field could congregate.

Back Talk — Use Statistics:
Are They Worth It? ......................... 93

by Anthony W. Ferguson — As libraries have more and more electronic resources from which to select for purchase, as budgets tighten, and as prices go up, the need for statistics on the use of electronic resources has moved to the forefront.
