One Poem

Sengarone Peter Vetsmany
Minnesota State University, Mankato

Light ຄຸງ

My grandma rubs my chest, says bo lukkkun,
I listen to her, not rising from table, I open my eyes
to dining room light warming my memories back, commotion eats my ears – uncles argue, Xok cries.

Ma weeps drown light when I look at uncles kneeling beneath window with tumbling sun,
on floor Xok screams with no legs, his hand gone.
Light is striking – silent flash, an eruption.

I drift off from agony. I recall tree branch
I held onto when Xok came running to tree, a cloud diminished his smile, a land mine stole his laughter, a flash brought me back down to dirt.

Eyes open to incense smoke dims light,
roams in shadows of war-torn house.
Grandma starts to chant a prayer, uncles follow her cadence, I knew when Ma stood beside light.

My brother, who followed me around Lao jungles, who I promised to buy chocolate for when we reach America, will never taste escape. In window, spirits comfort Xok away, his eyes extinguish in candlelight set beside him.
