Three Poems

The Room

The house is perfect.
A three-story colonial.
Four bedrooms, two baths,
kitchen and living room,
sunroom that overlooks
half an acre of yard.
I could see children
running in that green.
The neighborhood is quiet.
School within walking distance and in an excellent district.
The fire and police stations are a few blocks away.
My wife and I look at each other.
Our realtor disappears.
“This is the one,” I say.
She says, “The dining room is too small.”

Driving back I think about my first home in America.
A red building complex
where the bricks crumbled, fell on unsuspected passersby.
Fifteen of us crammed in a two-bedroom apartment.

We were happy to have non-dirt floor to sleep on,
roof over our heads,
running water to drink,
and blue flame rising
with the turn of a knob.
At night we huddled
to keep our bodies warm.
I cocooned in Grandma’s arms on the torn yellow couch that became a bed at night.
Unmarried aunts wrapped in gray blankets on the floor.
One uncle who survived a Khmer Rouge prison
slept in the dining room.
At night he moved the chairs, swept the floor, pushed
the dining table into the hallway, made a bed of two blankets,
his arms behind his head,
and slept like never before.

Man Lost in Long Beach

When the demons return his wife’s eyes turn eggshell white.
The man with ashen hair and tired eyes throws
a bottle, shatters it
against the white cupboard.
He walks out onto Anaheim, takes a right on Walnut towards the Pacific Ocean he once flew over some twenty five years ago.

He survived
the killing fields
by pretending to be a farmer, while others
were taken,
plastic bags muffled
their screams.

Hiding his name
in a paper boat,
he watched childhood
float away.
His parents shot
point blank.
His mother’s eyes
bulging white
and open forever.

Oversea Patriots

My friend asked,
“Why waste time translating?”

I was a doctoral student in Comparative Literature.

He persisted, “Who reads Khmer poetry anyway?”

We were having lunch
in the university courtyard.

“When I graduate, I’m going back to Kampuchea

and build me a business in making computers.

You’ll see how I rebuild
our Angkor Empire.”
