There is an old saying that goes “no good turn goes unpunished.” That is, paradoxically, it seems that whenever you try to do something good for someone, you will somehow suffer for the effort. Recently, I had that feeling regarding the decision to open the Main Library 24 hours per day and seven days per week.

The intention, or the good turn, was to keep the library open during the reading and examination weeks so that our students could prepare themselves for their examinations. Our punishments thus far have been threefold:

- The costs associated with providing security during the post 11:00 p.m. night hours when our staff goes home to eat and sleep have been fairly significant.
- The costs for extra cleaning staff to come in early in the morning to clean up after the hundreds of students who eat and drink while they are studying have mounted up.
- The need to deal with the anger expressed by some students, toward other students who attempt to lay claim to their favorite study tables, has been frustrating.

We are not new to the business of operating a round-the-clock study facility. We have had a 24/7 Student Learning Centre in the Main Library for the past four years. It is located on the ground floor next to Starbucks. It is situated there because it is the one section of the library which has its own rear entrance as well as a lockable doorway into the library itself. This means we can lock it off from the Main Library at closing time, or the whole enterprise can go bad. When a facility is in an orderly well kept condition, most of the students who enter it act in an orderly fashion. Just the opposite can happen when a facility is dirty and disorganized. Consequently, our decision to keep the library open all night meant that we needed to hire an extra cleaner to at least empty all the rubbish bins at the beginning of the evening. Early in the morning, however, after hundreds of messes were made, hundreds of new readers would descend upon the library beginning at 8:00 a.m. We found we needed to hire some extra help to get the library in super clean shape before it became mobbed with new students. Extra cleaners on a daily basis mean extra expenses — yet, this extra expense to help students is a good investment, right?

Opening the Main Library all night long means another nine hours of use. As any parent with teenagers and young adults in the family knows, young people can make a mess. Actually all humans make a mess. And hundreds of people means hundreds of messes, hundreds of empty water bottles, hundreds of scraps of paper, hundreds of paper wrappers from food consumed, hundreds of chairs and tables moved right and left, and thousands of books pulled out of the stacks and left lying around after they are used. All of these messes have to be cleaned up or the whole enterprise can go bad. When a facility is in an orderly well kept condition, most of the people who enter it act in an orderly fashion. Just the opposite can happen when a facility is in dirty and disorganized. Consequently, our decision to keep the library open all night meant that we needed to hire an extra cleaner to at least empty all the rubbish bins at the beginning of the evening. Early in the morning, however, after hundreds of messes were made, hundreds of new readers would descend upon the library beginning at 8:00 a.m. We found we needed to hire some extra help to get the library in super clean shape before it became mobbed with new students. Opening the library 24/7 produced another problem: Some students decide to take advantage of this opportunity to lock their computer to their favorite desk or otherwise pile their personal belongings on that desk. Then they will leave knowing that no one else can use the desk and that they can come back and use it anytime they want. Since we only have 1,200 seats in the library, however, when student 1,201 comes in we have a problem. If every seat had a student sitting on it, the new student would understand. Yet the problem is, many seats are empty but the desk has a computer or a pile of books and papers on it. In the words of one student who wrote me:

“I did a quick count this morning when I arrived at 10 a.m. on the second floor. There are totally six seats, 8 of them were occupied by students. 60 of them [occupied] by papers and books. 13 people were either standing, sitting on couches, or in front of the computers. I removed a book, a hand cream and a pen from a desk yesterday and placed them at one of the computer tables and they are still there untouched... The problem is a very serious one. Students clearly abuse the concession from the library.”

Last semester we tried cleaning desks that had lain idle for two hours or longer but that just resulted in disputes with students who complained that they had just stepped away when the library staff member came by their desk. We also detected that while seats with electrical outlets were in high demand, those without might stand idle. Consequently, for this term we added another 500 electric outlets in order to increase the number of attractive seats. It appears that this latter act was a success but the result is even more students coming to the library to study and use their laptops at the same time. Since the ability of students to “stake out” a seat was based upon the premise that the library never closed for three weeks, this year, when the Swine Flu arrived, we took advantage of the need to disinfect desks and now close it for two hours in the early morning for cleaning. This means students have to take their computers and things out at least for a couple of hours. The result has been the daily queuing up of a hundred or so students all rushing for their favorite seats — but it does give everyone willing to line up at 8:00 in the morning a fresh chance to get a coveted seat. Once again we have spent more money and effort: more electrical outlets, staff to deal with angry students, cleaners to disinfect desks — yet, this extra expense to help students is a good investment, right?

We do think these extra investments are worth it. But, since no good turn goes unpunished, what is next?
