The Academic Library World Looks at Public Libraries

Guest Editor, Margaret Landesman

Our Users Are Your Users.....	1	A Recipe for Success.....	34
by Margaret Landesman — Academic and public libraries share core values and goals. We share users. We can get closest to filling our mission if we work at this together and if both sets of librarians work at telling both sets of users about both sets of libraries.		Two Cups of Collaboration, Two Cups of Hard Work, and a Cup of Good Timing — Facilitating the 2007 Pennsylvania Library Association Conference by Lisa German — This is about a collaboration between a public and the university research library.

A View Toward the Public Side of Scholarly Communication..... 18

by John Ober — There is untapped potential to share and collaborate on scholarly communication issues, starting with public access to publicly-funded research results.

Medical Information 24

When Limited Access Can Have Life-changing Consequences by Sally Patrick — There is no subject where information being current, accurate, and thoroughly validated is as critical as it is with medical information.

“Free to all” 26

Made Possible by an Academic/Public Library Collaboration by Barbara G. Preece — As the first large library consortium to announce a self-funded partnership with a major digitalizing project, the Open Content Alliance, the Boston Library Consortium is providing materials with none of the restrictions that apply to materials scanned by Google or Microsoft.

The Alabama Vision..... 28

by Sue O. Medina — Library users need to move easily among their communities' libraries, seeking information regardless of the “type of library” available to them. No single library or type of library can meet all the needs of its users.

Enriching Communities..... 32

A Shared Interest for Academic and Public Libraries by Anne Carr-Wiggin and Louise Reimer — Public libraries are grounded in the cornerstone belief that they are central to the quality of life in their communities, working within a framework of community partnerships.
