2014

Booklover: Gross National Happiness

Donna Jacobs
MUSC, donna.jacobs55@gmail.com

Follow this and additional works at: https://docs.lib.purdue.edu/atg

Part of the Library and Information Science Commons

Recommended Citation
Jacobs, Donna (2014) "Booklover: Gross National Happiness," Against the Grain: Vol. 26: Iss. 1, Article 33.
DOI: https://doi.org/10.7771/2380-176X.6676

This document has been made available through Purdue e-Pubs, a service of the Purdue University Libraries. Please contact epubs@purdue.edu for additional information.
I live in an age of chattering masses, a phrase not to be confused with "the chattering classes." The latter were eggheads, soi-disant intellectuals, or tweed-coated academics who readily opined on any topic, some of whom actually knew what they were talking about. The chattering classes essentially talked to each other, noses firmly in the air at times, so the rest of us hoi-polloi might learn something. It was a phrase for an elitist age, and it did not sit well as we began to let it all hang out.

Today, however, we have thrown out the chattering classes for the chattering masses. In our hyper-connected age, everybody talks to everybody else, with all sorts of entertaining news from the burned toast, to the failed romance, to that-veal-did-not-sit-well-last-night-#-explosions, we "blow up" the Twitterverse with our claptrap that masquerades as real conversation. And speaking of explosions, we “blow up” the Twitterverse with our claptrap that masquerades as real conversations and human connections. Essentially we are all talking to ourselves because no one is really listening.

The delight in all this is it's instantaneous! I italicize the word because that lends both credibility and celerity to it. It's another way of saying there is no time for reflection, no time for second thoughts (those are shared later, if at all), or even any time for self-censorship. The most interesting of these are the chronicles of romance that run the gamut from the icky schmaltz to the randy obscene. Celebrities going off on each other are also fun, as are companies that say what shouldn’t be said and offend most everyone, or say what they should, but their timing is off preempting company headquarters. Then there are those government nudkins who think they know what they’re doing, but blurt out information that was really meant to be secret, classified, or released at a later date.

That instantaneousness I italicized earlier is partly to blame. Everyone is in a rush to be first, to get there — wherever there is — before anyone else does. So, they rush the bread out of the oven, and lo and behold, when it comes out all gooey and inedible, they are confounded by it, hoisted on their own petards. And yet it continues, day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year. Even presidents, especially those who are so certain they are tech-savvy-cool end up tweeting when they should have been trucking to the Constitution.

We enjoy Twitter nitwits like Anthony Weiner — only God could have a sense of humor like this — who thinks of the Internet as a cone of silence (http://bit.ly/1cbqLIZ) and so send pictures that this family magazine cannot even describe. In many ways, people like this deserve what they get, courtesy of the lightning rod we call the Internet.

But none of this worries me so much as these anonymous chattering masses that no one knows who they are, only that they are legion. They shout about a movie, a book, a company, a factoid, not knowing much about any of these things but loving the sound of their clicking keys. I have written before of Farhad Manjoo’s excellent article about how online readers won’t read to the end of an article before commenting; they rarely read beyond the first scroll (http://slate.me/1c7b5C). Elsewhere (http://bit.ly/1k7circ) I have written about Dan Fagin’s experience of writing about his brother-in-law’s heart attack (http://slate.me/1JkgXAM) only to have his Twitter followers have Fagin dead and buried. One group even began a prayer chain — a nice gesture to be sure — but for Fagin not his brother-in-law. Then there is the Twitter crowd who paused to reflect on Neil Armstrong’s death … a year too late (http://usatoday.com/magazines/1906-06-09).

This isn’t so much a reading problem — though it certainly is that — as it is a cultural shift to react, not think, to post, never reflect, to chatter, and not shut up for even a second. They ruin movies, people’s lives, restaurants, appliances, books, enterprises large and small, and for what? For no other reason than they want to see their ALL CAPS IN PRINT. For this we are giving up newspapers, personal communications, books, libraries, and Lord only knows what else!?

Europeans have long thought of Americans as shallow, frivolous, and a bit too silly. We complain that they are staid and too “uptight.” But are we a bit too superficial for our own good?

Are our own technology, our tweets, and our posts proving their criticisms in spades?
“Things always go smoothly with Emery-Pratt. Their people are knowledgeable, and always provide friendly, rapid service.”

Cameron University
Lawton, OK

8 Library Services That Will... Make You Smile.

1) Publishing Sources - Almost 200,000 at our disposal
2) New Title Selection Plan - Immediate notification
3) Electronic Ordering - Simple online ordering system
4) Early Release Program - Immediate availability guarantee
5) Cataloging - We do the busy-work for you
6) Comprehensive Reporting - Up-to-the-minute order status
7) Duplicate Order Alert - We’re on guard, you avoid hassles
8) Paperback Reinforcement & Binding - Avoid expensive wear & obsolescence

For more details, visit: emery-pratt.com

Dependability. Reliability. Smileability.

1966 W M 21, Owosso, MI 48867-9317
Phone: 800 248-3887 • Fax: 800 523-6379
emery-pratt.com

Booklover
from page 50

Community vitality, cultural diversity, ecological resilience, living standard, health, education, good governance.” A statistical analysis of indicators, variables, cut off points, and degrees illustrate how the index is in use in the country of Bhutan. The legal code of 1729 developed during the unification of Bhutan states: “if the Government cannot create happiness (dekid) for its people, there is no purpose for the Government to exist.” In 1972, the 4th King of Bhutan declared: “Gross National Happiness to be more important than the GNP” and the GNH Index was developed as a standard for the country. Although there is no one official definition for GNH, the document shares the following statement that is widely in use: “Gross National Happiness (GNH) measures the quality of a country in a more holistic way [than GNP] and believes that the beneficial development of human society takes place when material and spiritual development occurs side by side to complement and reinforce each other.” The particular reference to happiness despite disparity was the element to connect life to literature for me.

Alice Munro was born in Wingham, Ontario. She began writing in her teens and continued this interest in her studies at the University of Western Ontario. English and journalism were her academic pursuits prior to marriage. She and her husband settled in British Columbia and opened a bookstore, “Munro’s Books.” (This fact makes me happy.) Her first story collection, “Dance of the Happy Shades,” was published in 1968, and Canada began to take notice of this crafter of words in the form of short stories. The Nobel Committee praised her as the “master of the contemporary short story” when honoring her with the prize. “We’re not saying just that she can say a lot in just 20 pages — more than an average novel writer can — but also that she can cover ground. She can have a single short story that covers decades, and it works,” said Peter Englund, permanent secretary of the Swedish Academy.

“Too Much Happiness” is Alice Munro’s collection of 10 short stories entitled:
- Dimensions
- Fiction
- Wenlock Edge
- Deep Holes
- Free Radicals
- Face
- Some Women
- Child’s Play
- Wood
- Too Much Happiness

Murder, suicide, adultery, humiliation, despair, loneliness, violence, oppression, and sexual manipulation are a few of the “happy” threads that weave through this collection. The philosophical pondering continues. What constitutes happy when your life has been impacted and altered by inhumanity? Thanks to Nobel authors and governmental think tanks we are still in the discussion.

The last story of the collection is a result of Munro’s random discovery of Sophia Kovalevsky, a 19th-century Russian mathematician and novelist. She discovered Sophia while researching another subject in the “Britannica.” The combination of mathematician and novelist piqued Munro’s interest, and after seeking out everything about her she wrote a fictionalized story of her last days filled with flashbacks to her earlier life.

As I exit my writing cubby, I leave you with two quotes from this final short story of “Too Much Happiness”:

“She has already written to Julia, saying it is to be happiness after all. Happiness after all. Happiness.”

“Always remember that when a man goes out of the room, he leaves everything in it behind,” her friend Marie Mendelson has told her. “When a woman goes out she carries everything that happened in the room along with her.”

Against the Grain / February 2014
<http://www.against-the-grain.com> 51