GRIM DAYS IN VICHY FRANCE

AND WHILE WE’RE ON WAR …
by Bruce Strauch (The Citadel)

Let’s have five reads on D-Day. (1) Ed. Winston Ramsey, D-Day Then and Now (this is condensed from After the Battle, a magazine with a big rep among WWII historians)(1995); (2) Jonathan Gawne, Spearheading D-Day (a look at all the special units you never hear about: Coast Guard, Navy Scouts and Raiders, special beach battalions, signalmen et al.) (1998); (3) Max Hastings, Overlord (covers entire Normandy campaign) (1984); (4) Donald Burgett, Carruhee! (account of a 19-year-old paratrooper) (1967); (5) Joseph Balkoski, Omaha Beach (sometimes referred to as finest living D-Day historian) (2004).

LIQUID LUNCH LOG
by Bruce Strauch (The Citadel)

A profile of federal judge Denise Cote who handled the price-fixing prosecution of various publishers and Apple. She hit the publishers with $166 million in sanctions to compensate readers who were overcharged on books (Have you gotten a check? I haven’t. But even more devastating to them, she required they keep a record of their familiar cozy chats over lunch at the Union Square Café.

This is reported to have chilled the book business.

But of course. It doesn’t pay. Liquid lunches are the only joy.

ANONYMOUS AUTHORS
by Bruce Strauch (The Citadel)

The Allen Drury series — Advice and Consent; Decision; Mark Coffin, U.S.S. — are among the remarkably few novels about D.C.’s “grasping politicians, ambitious reporters and wheedling influence-peddlers.” They have been out of print but are now reissued by WordFire Press.

Primary Colors got some brief attention largely because the author was anonymous and everyone played a guessing game.

But the first significant Washington novel was also published anonymously. Democracy was a tale of corruption and amorality set in U.S. Grant’s scandal-ridden administration. It came out on April Fool’s Day 1880. Three decades later, the author was discovered to be Henry Adams.

RECORDS OF UNSPARING FRANKNESS
by Bruce Strauch (The Citadel)

Someone has an ironic sense of humor. Because blockbuster author Jeffrey Archer went to prison for perjury due to a diary someone kept. But let’s see Archer’s favorite reads on diaries. And for anyone who went to Fiesole in Cambridge, he lives in Grantchester where Rupert Brooke used to bicycle for tea.

Is the Future Convergence or Collision?
